By Gerlinda Grimes NEW YORK (TheStreet) -- While moral debate continues to rage, the fact is that online gambling is gaining traction in the United States.This week, New Jersey joined Nevada and Delaware as the only state where legalized online gambling is, and it's certainly the largest population. While one additional space isn't ground-shattering, it can really start to turn the game world around if it turns out to be a success. If the New Jersey experience goes well, more states are likely to start legalizing online gambling, even though many political leaders claim to be focused on their moral compass, and their main concern is addiction problems. However, that hasn't stopped them from allowing the public to legally drink alcohol, smoke cigarettes or buy scratch cards, so my guess is that it won't ultimately stryage the nationwide legalization of online gambling, especially given the expected revenue. If the transition to online gambling eventually progresses, will it mean the end for Atlantic City, Las Vegas and other physical casino buildings and resorts? I have my doubts. A lot of people don't go to Vegas just to get their game fixes. They go into the mood with friends and family, or sometimes it's for business, events and seminars. Ultimately, casinos are probably the biggest winners. For the time being, online gambling sites must operate through casinos. That may change in the future, but it's a good sign for casinos that have slowly bled to death. Atlantic City's revenue is about 40% from its 2006 peak, which means a successful transition to online gambling is all the more important. Its main problem is strict regulation of age restrictions and addiction issues. in addition, the Income streams with the obvious problem that gambling can ruin some people's lives, politicians have to decide whether it is fair for the majority of the population to be arrested for something because a minority of people cannot control it. It seems to me to be when, not an if scenario. If you're in camp that online gambling eventually sees its way through settings and into tablet screens and smartphones, there are some casino stocks you should consider buying because they're willing to jump through all the legal and regulatory hounds and then manage market share. According to a recent Bloomberg report, not all of them are on board yet. Some are all for the move, such as MGM Resorts International (MGM) - Get Report CEO Jim Murren, who said: [Nevada must] be able to work with other states to increase the liquidity pool and increase visits to all sites. I think that's going to happen. He's in favor of legalizing it nationwide at some point. MGM recently partnered with Bwin.Party Digital Entertainment, the world's largest online gambling site. The company trades on the London Stock Exchange and focuses mainly on poker and sports betting, the first of which was the main reason MGM wanted to enter into a deal. Alongside MGM for online gambling is Gary Loveman, CEO of CaesarsEntertainment (CZR) - Get Report. According to Murren, Loveman focuses on nationwide legalization and considers online poker to be a very important business for his company. Unlike MGM and CZR, WynnResorts (WYNN) - Steve Wynn, CEO of Get Report, hesitates to move into the digitalized world of online gambling and admits he failed to see the business opportunity. While Wynn is uncertain about the future, LasVegasSands (LVS) - Get Report CEO Sheldon Adelson is downright against it. He called it a social evil that must end and was concerned about gambling and addiction issues in childhood. Perhaps Adelson is more concerned that he will not get his share of online pie because the vast majority of LVS revenue comes from abroad, only 14% come from the US. But perhaps addiction problems are Adelson's concern on this issue. From a shareholder point of view, it seems a good thing that most of the company's revenue comes from outside the United States, as LVS doesn't seem likely to jump on the online bandwagon anytime soon. Whether it is right or wrong, I believe that online gambling will ultimately be legal throughout the United States. The question for investors remains: Which companies benefit most from it and which do not? I appeal to early adopters like MGM and CZR. While they are likely to hit some roadblocks along the way, they can strengthen dominance in companies such as WYNN and LVS as management approves a new gambling At the time of publication, the author had no position on any of those strains. The World Golf Tour offers everything an avid golfer would ever need in a free online game - even if the benefits come at a price. Still, it's better to buy a PC or Mac golf game than to rely on free online services of this size, as speeds are often delayed when too many people sign up at once. When.
